RaY

Research at the University of York St John

For more information please contact RaY at ray@yorksj.ac.uk

Theological and Psychological Reflections on Identity in Sport

Nick Watson, York St John University

York St John University,
Faculty of Health and Life Sciences,
Lord Mayor's Walk,
York, Y031 7EX,
England

n.watson@yorksj.ac.uk

Abstract

This essay examines 'athletic identity' from a Christian theological and psychological standpoint. In discussing the concept of identity within the sports world, I address a range of related issues, such as idolatry, sin and states of heart such as pride and humility. According to Phil Night, founder and chairperson of Nike, sports 'define the culture of the world'[1] and thus an examination of the cultural context in which identity is formed is also presented. Areas for future research are provided in the conclusion, for example, reflections on identity for sportspersons with physical and intellectual disabilities.

Introduction

'Sport, as many commentators have noted, is the new religion. It has superseded Christianity in many cultural theorists' eyes as the social practice par excellence that initiates persons into rules and norms of virtuous and vicious behaviours which orientate us more broadly in the world'.[2]

Mike McNamee

'Fourth in the Olympics hurt, but retirement is like a death in the family … I struggled for three months … I'd walk around and just start filling up. I'd wake up lost. I didn't know what to do. My emotions were so intense I felt I'd lost a member of the family. I'd lost a major part of my life, something was dead. Everything I'd lived for was over'.

British Olympic Decathlete, Dean Macey, on retiring from sport[3]

[1] Theologians and philosophers[4] have argued that we need to think more philosophically about the meaning of sport participation and competition. Kretchmar has recently suggested that in studying sport 'to do ethics in vacuo', without some sort of metaphysical (i.e., religious) basis is a questionable endeavor. He sees athletes as 'meaning-seeking, story-telling creatures', who can encounter real drama, experience excellence and self-discovery in healthy sporting contests.[5] In relation, a small number of sport psychologists have also challenged the current dominance within their discipline of positivistic research and cognitive-behavioral consultancy techniques advocating the need for more holistic, philosophical, existential) and spiritual and religious approaches.[6]

[2] These recent shifts toward spiritual and religious concepts, within the disciplines of sport philosophy and sport psychology are encouraging and make a significant contribution to my thinking in terms of understanding the complexities of athletic identity. This said, the foundational source of identity (ontologically and epistemologically)[7] throughout this body of work is, as Frankl[8] states, '… a human phenomenon rather than divine', and thus puts the self at the centre of the framework of meaning (humanism and naturalism), rather than God (supernaturalism). I will argue that this is diametrically opposed to a Christian theological perspective of identity as described in the Bible, in which humans are called to deny them*selves* and live in Christ (Matt. 16: 24-27).[9] This is not as burdensome a thing as it may sound to some but rather something that, as C.S Lewis[10] notes, actually leads humans to freedom of heart, peace and becoming 'more truly themselves…it is when I turn to Christ, when I give up myself to His personality, that I first begin to have a personality of my own'.

[3] In hopefully adding something new to the valuable past psychological, psychiatric and clinical, sociological and pedagogical work on athletic identity, and related research on self-worth and dispositional neurotic perfectionism in sport that is based on a secular and humanistic worldview[11], this approach provides a significantly different understanding of personhood and how we understand ourselves and others in competitive sport. Its core premise is that humans' identity, that is, their feeling, thinking, attitudes and behavior, should be grounded in, and flow from, the heart of a loving Father God. As Paul states in the Bible (Acts 17: 28) when addressing the Athenian philosophers, 'for in him we live and move and have our being …'.

[4] This study is also needed due to longitudinal sports ethics research that has suggested that athletes in Christian and secular American schools show very little difference, if any, in moral-reasoning and that Christian athletes had a tendency to compartmentalize their faith and exclude it from competitive sport[12]. Why is this so? Can Christian athletes simply learn and follow the strict moral code of the Bible (an important dimension of Christian faith) and feel, think and act in the heat of competition and in relationships, in a Christ-like manner? I will argue not, due to the foundational biblical principle that the state of the 'heart' of the believer, their disposition - the depth of relationship and intimacy with God through Jesus Christ - is the source of all right and wrong, feeling, thinking and acting.

'Above all else guard your heart, for it is the wellspring of life'.

(Proverbs 4: 23)

'The mouth speaks out of the overflow of the heart'.

(Matthew 12: 34)

[5] My anthropological start point is predicated on the biblical position that all humans are made in the image of God - imago Dei (Gen. 1: 27) and comprise soul, body and spirit (1Thessalonians. 5: 23). This division of self is useful in analyzing identity in sport. However, throughout this paper, I wish to combat the Platonic-Cartesian mind-body dualism entrenched in the western thought by referring to the soul, body and spirit holistically as the heart, a Hebrew and Pauline perspective.[13] This view maintains that the human-being is thoroughly integrated, though with different aspects.

[6] Consistent with this idea that the Christian faith can be described as a personal and intimate relationship with God in the 'heart' of the human believer, versus a dry rule-governed legalistic and judgmental religion (arguably an idol and huge defense mechanism in the modern world), and that the word heart is spoken of hundreds of times in the Bible, it is necessary to provide some explanation of this term. In a little known and arguably neglected book, Biblical Psychology[14], Oswald Chambers provides some clarity on the spiritual nature of the human heart, which he calls the 'radiator of the personal life' - the source of human identity and moral reasoning:

> 'The use of the Bible term 'heart' is best understood by simply saying 'me'. The heart is not merely the seat of the affections, it is the centre of everything. The heart is the central altar, and the body is the outer court. What we offer on the altar of the heart will tell ultimately through the extremities of the body…the centre from which God's working and the devil's working, the centre from which everything works which moulds the human mechanism…Our Lord undertakes to fill the whole region of the heart with light and holiness … (2 Corinthians. 4: 6) ... Do I realize that I need it done? Or do I think I can realize myself? That is the great phrase today, and it is growing in popularity - 'I must realize myself''.

[7] 'I must realize myself'? Indeed, Chambers' reflections from the early 20th century are, I would argue, prophetic for the age in which we live. The cultural ethos of 'self-realization', or what has been called 'selfism' by psychologist Paul Vitz,[15] is so encultured in the west that I agree with those who have argued that pride of the heart 'is now synonymous with virtue' in the institutions of media, sport and religion.[16] To be sure, this view of identity and self-worth that has no objective foundation, as it is relative to each person, is so deeply woven into the fabric of society, that it is, as the 19th century writer Kierkegaard states, the worst form of despair, a 'fictitious health'.[17] Why? Because it is, as Kierkegaard called it, the disposition of the 'automatic cultural man' an unconscious denial of the reality of life built on self, instead of the source of our being, a Holy loving God. This idea is not new and supports the maxim, 'read an old book for a new idea'!

[8] As articulated in the writings of St. Augustine, Kierkegaard, Dostoyevsky, Oswald Chambers, G.K. Chesterton and C.S. Lewis and of course the fountain of all their musings, the Bible, the insidiousness of pride and narcissism in the west's cultural value system has resulted in widespread cultural and social fragmentation. This is, in part, a consequence of the liberalization of ethics and the 'human potential' movement (e.g., Esalen Institute) in America. The titles of notable books such as The Culture of Narcissism: Life in an Age of Diminishing Expectations (1980), Psychology as Religion: The Cult of Self-Worship (1994) and Ernest Becker's award winning The Denial of Death (1973),[18] also accurately convey our current situation. Nonetheless, liberal-humanist and post-modern voices that dominate academic sports studies (e.g., sociology, philosophy, psychology, pedagogy) and other disciplines, at times seem oblivious to the evidence all around them that the 19th and 20th century utopian 'myths of progress' have been unable to prevent, and have often contributed to, what David Blankenhorn, and many others in theology and sport and leisure studies[19] have accurately called a Fatherless Generation.

[9] A principal aim of this paper is to suggest that the foundational answer to this problem lies in individuals, communities and nations coming into a knowledge and personal revelation of the love of a Father God. To achieve any clear understanding of individual human identity from this perspective, I must also examine the dominant characteristics (identity) of the society and culture in which individual identity is formed—enculturation. For as Phil Night, founder and chairperson of Nike states, sports arguably 'define the culture of the world'[20].

[10] After providing a rationale for the need of this study, my first task is to analyze the conceptual nature of sports competition and its role in understanding 'athletic identity', which has been defined as 'the degree to which an individual identifies with the athlete role'[21]. This will allow for a theological and psychological analysis of identity in sport, focusing on pride, humility and idolatry. Pride and humility are the two states of heart that I see as fundamental in understanding both positive and negative aspects of identity in sport. I will then provide extended Concluding Remarks due to the embryonic nature of the study of identity in sport from a Christian perspective and some suggestions for future empirical research and scholarship and a range of resources to assist in this process.

Identity and Competition in Sport

[11] In his book Winning: The Psychology of Competition[22], Stuart Walker makes a number of points about athletic competition, which are important when examining issues of identity in sport:

> 'Most competitors think of themselves as being primarily motivated to develop, demonstrate, and enjoy competence. Many, however, are also concerned with the demonstration of power, courage, and aggressiveness. They use competition to overcome feelings of dependence, helplessness, and loss of individuality. Others are more concerned with being approved, appreciated, and admired. They use competition to overcome feelings of being separated, abandoned, and unloved. Competition permits the demonstration of individual significance, which gratifies desire for both assertiveness and approval. The key word is "demonstration." Competitors perform in public; they assert themselves in the presence of others - of their competitors at the very least'.

[12] Walker's psychological thesis holds some weight, however as Newman[23] notes, Walker overstates his point as to how competitions are primarily activated, i.e., winning is the only goal of the athlete. This thesis is far too simplistic and I would agree with Simon[24], who notes that competition in sport is ethically defensible and that the 'meeting of the demands athletes place upon their talents often involves beauty, courage, dedication, and passion'. Nonetheless, the intense emotion and passion often present in the delicately balanced dialectic of competitive sport, Hyland[25] suggests, also carries the risk that 'such intensity will devolve into alienation and violence'. This is closely tied to athletes' (and coaches', parents' etc.) need for recognition, love and demonstrating power and significance, which is conveyed by Walker and is arguably one mainstay of modern competitive sport.

[13] A psychoanalytical perspective of these needs in competitive sport, Kohn[26] suggests, would basically run something like: winning = coach's approval = parental acceptance [in child/youth sport] = acceptance of self (self worth). In extending Kohn's social-psychological analysis to include the spiritual, this unhealthy 'disordering of our affections', as church father St. Augustine (354-430c.) put it, may lead to perversion and corruption of the activity in which 'the athlete may delude himself into thinking that his own quest for wealth and fame, or even a championship, will make him happy'.[27] In other words, for athletes and coaches of this mindset it would seem that 'sport is life'[28] and to lose, or be unable to play for whatever the reason, can have catastrophic consequences for the emotional and psychological balance of an individual; that is, their identity.

[14] England Rugby Union World Cup star, Johnny Wilkinson, has recently confessed the underlying reason for the 'near destruction of his career - an obsessive quest for perfection'[29]. This is something that is acutely conveyed in the title of his recent biography, Tackling Life: Striving for Perfection (2008)[30]. In light of the 'win-at-all-costs' ethic, reflect on Wilkinson's very honest and illustrative comments about his injuries, the meaning of rugby for him and how this has impacted upon his psychological well-being and understanding of life itself:

'The truth is that I was wracked with anxiety, almost constantly. I wanted it [to achieve] so badly that I was beating myself up. It was the same whether I played for Newcastle, England or the Lions. Before the game it was nerves. After the game it was a harsh post-mortem - why did I miss that tackle? Why did I miss that conversion? … All the intensity and attrition brought with it intense fatigue. That resulted in injuries which, in turn, have resulted in a lot of pain and anguish … You hear yourself saying only good things will come of this, that there's a reason for it and you've saved yourself for two years of being battered but none of it is really true … I would have given anything to have played consistently … There have been times when it's been hugely painful. I've been incredibly depressed, demoralised, even bitter … I feel as if I've let myself down then, because it's all about setting benchmarks as a person and there have been times when I've failed to reach these marks. It has made me lose my way in so far as all my life I've done nothing but think and play rugby. When it's taken away from you for as long as it has been, it makes you unsure over what you're supposed to do with your life'.[31]

[15] Interestingly, Wilkinson's emotional rollercoaster following a catalogue of injuries since his moment of glory with that famous drop-kick in the dying seconds of the 2003 Rugby World Cup Final (Sydney), has led Times journalist, Souster[32], to suggest that he has now undergone an almost '… spiritual change'. Arguably, Wilkinson has experienced what the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber called a 'shudder of identity'[33], that is, one of the primary sources of meaning in life has been removed and he is searching his soul for purpose and meaning. Ruben[34] captures something of this in stating that for 'many strong competitors, upon reaching the summit of their aspirations … the discovery, ultimately, that "making it" is often a hollow gain, is one of the most traumatic events that the successful can experience'. Along with many others, Wilkinson has encountered the existential angst, fear and sense of worthlessness that often accompanies the loss of a significant 'life project' (Sartre)[35] like sport, what cultural anthropologist, Ernest Becker, [36]aptly describes as the 'dread of insignificance'. This anxiety and sense of worthlessness is likely to be more intense for professional full-time athletes[37] such as Wilkinson, in comparison to amateurs due to the greater time, significance, meaning and ultimately sense of identity invested in sport, a 'life project'.

[16] Sad stories of retired athletes, for example British soccer players from the 1980s and early 1990s in particular, sliding into alcoholism and suffering from serious relationship problems (e.g., divorce) illustrate the potentially catastrophic identity issues that can ensue when sport, the 'life project', is lost.[38] The poignant and yet often failed and embarrassing 'comebacks' of professional athletes at the end of their careers, is another example of how sport can become an 'unhealthy obsession'. The 'old pro' is unable to let go of their sporting life in an anxious quest to hold onto a major source of their identity in life. Evidence of this existential angst in elite and youth sport performers has been shown in research on dispositional neurotic perfectionism, 'fear of failure', psychiatric writings on the mental health of athletes and theological and philosophical reflection on shame in sport,[39] with athletes suffering from feelings of narcissism, guilt, shame, negative mood and resultant decrements in performance.

[17] For an athlete in competitive sports, the feeling associated with moving teams, athletic retirement, career-ending injuries and defeat can be great and is often the precursor to feelings of loss and neurotic anxiety, and in some cases what consultant sport psychiatrist Robert Burton classifies as Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PSTD).[40] Indeed, for some athletes this loss of identity and self-worth associated with these perceived traumatic occurrences in sport, has resulted in clinical depression and occasionally suicide attempts, as was sometimes the case in ancient Greek athletics.[41]

[18] Although this is not a simple correlation, since many other factors determine an athlete's sense of identity, such as sex, personality, race and ethnicity, education, culture, family background and past experience, the physical body, the individual's name and group membership,[42] nevertheless playing and winning equals 'being', and losing equates to 'non-being'. 'Non-being threatens man's self-affirmation' suggests theologian Paul

Tillich.[43] In the athletic arena this may lead to a sense of unworthiness and insecurity in the athlete when they lose, or fail to come up to the often unrealistic and unhealthy expectations of pushy coaches, parents and even nations.

[19] Though by definition, these losses are simply a temporal evaluation, ask any athlete or coach and, if honest, they will admit that at times they allow their performance to define their being and so for them a loss is tantamount to defeat or failure (symbolic death) as a person. This is what sport psychologists call the 'hero-to-zero' syndrome. In discussing the loss and sorrow of losing in competitive sport, Higgs and Braswell use 'the term "pseudo-sorrow" to express the emotional state of losers' and state that 'real sorrow lives in hospitals and in funeral homes and indeed ordinary homes without number'.[44] While of course there is very real suffering in sport that can be a mix of physical, mental and spiritual[45], this again conveys how sport has become for many in the west an idol that is intimately tied to the identity and self-worth of athletes and fans. I am not suggesting that athletes should not passionately care about sport and become emotionally involved. This is in part what makes sport participation and competition so exciting, fulfilling and healthy.

[20] In support of Hochstetler, Hopsicker and Kretchmar's holistic conception of sport,[46] neither do I advocate a dualistic worldview in which 'real sorrow' only exists in 'real life' outside of sport. I hold firmly to a biblical, Pauline and ultimately Jewish anthropology - mind, body and spirit are viewed as one (nephesh) - supporting the notion that our experience of suffering, loss, joy and sorrow, is valid in all of life's diverse situations and messiness.[47] However, if 'post-match blues' slide into prolonged self-pity, moods and depression that affects the athlete and is projected on to others, then arguably, sport has become an idol. The destructive consequences of the 'win-at-all-costs' ethic of modern sport (especially on individual identity) has been examined in more detail elsewhere[48] and is also prevalent in organized child and youth sport that reflects trends in professional adult sport.

11

[21] A wealth of studies and writings exist that have documented the negative and worrying trends in elite child and youth sport development strategies and grass-roots sport policy, which are linked to the cultural ethos of winning-at-all-costs. I would argue the most comprehensive analysis of this endemic problem is Paulo David's important book, Human Rights in Youth Sport: A Critical Review of Children's rights in Competitive Sports[49] that covers areas such as overtraining, eating disorders, physical and mental burnout, elite youth sport programs and the negative effect of parental pressure and expectations.

[22] Instead of viewing competition as a healthy test or mutual striving toward excellence, the etymological root of the term,[50] or as a playful form of developmental recreation, it has become to some degree a questioning of the athlete's or child's/youth's very existence and their source of self-worth. This has been clearly articulated by religious studies scholar, Michael Grimshaw,[51] in his analysis of the idolatrous nature of modern sport, in which he argues a 'pagan mythology of fallible gods' has evolved. To be sure, for many participants and spectators modern sport is a religion in the ritualistic and functional sense, with many similarities evident between the practice and rituals of modern sport and religion.[52]

[23] For the elite athlete, winning in sport is then frequently inflated to a form of immortality[53] and thus idolatry, resulting in the individual seeking to justify the meaning of their existence through their sport participation. The complex and differing motivations of heart to succeed, in the 1924 Olympic Games, shown by Harold Abrahams and Eric

Liddle, is beautifully portrayed in the award winning film, Chariots of Fire, and is a good example of this. As Cashmore has noted in his socio-historical analysis of the film, Abrahams '... individualistic, self-interested approach to competition … is … entirely congruent with the 'win-at-all-costs' mentality that was to become prevalent in [modern] sport'.[54] From a Christian perspective, glorification of the self in any human endeavor, as was arguably one motivation of Harold Abrahams in this film, is rooted in the sin of pride, the 'complete anti-God state of heart', according to C.S. Lewis.[55]

The Role of Pride and Humility in Sporting Identity

[24] Sporting tales, as those described above, illustrate how the ego of the athlete can predominate in a quest to win and ultimately to appear and feel superior or even god-like, which when you consider Harold Abrahams words and the boasts of modern athletes together with the explicit worship of modern sports stars in the media and their institutionalization in Halls of Fame, I would argue is not an exaggeration for some. Drawing on excerpts from Schneider's theology of personhood and his criticisms of Sartre's atheism, Pannenberg[56] articulates this clearly:

> 'To the extent that human beings try to gain their wholeness and strive to be "in and for themselves," they are always a "desire to be God" … Thus the striving for the self-realization that is directed toward the wholeness of one's being is in fact to be understood as an expression of sin, of the will "to be like God"'.

[25] From a psychological standpoint, this can be understood as the athlete, coach, sporting parent (vicariously) needing to attain 'self-actualization'[57] through worldly success, adulation and affirmation in competition and their career. Van Kaam[58] in his incisive assessment of modern psychology and modern culture, points to this, in suggesting that 'an overemphasis on introspective attitudes has seriously hindered the spiritual growth of western man … we are ego-centered, when we should be God-centered'. In support of Van Kaam and the reflections of the theologian Pannenberg, psychologist, Paul Vitz concludes in his trenchant critique of humanistic and atheistic-existential psychology - the work of Jung, Rogers, Fromm and Maslow - that the 'relentless and single-minded search for and glorification of the self…is at direct cross-purposes with the Christian injunction to lose the self'.[59] Lose the self in an age of success?

[26] By modern worldly standards of success, Jesus Christ was the greatest failure in human history, something that was clearly prophesied in the writings of the Old Testament prophet Isaiah, seven hundred years before his birth. To be sure, the Christian story does not portray Jesus as a 'self-actualizer'! No, the Christian narrative records that he '... made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness. And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death on a cross!' (Philippians 2: 7-8). The gospels (trans. Greek, good news) in the New Testament, which are both prophetic and historical documents, state that from the time Jesus 'set his face to go to Jerusalem' after his wrestling with his calling and destiny in the garden of Gethsemane, the words of Isaiah the prophet began to be fulfilled:

> 'He was despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows, and familiar with suffering....he was despised and we esteemed him not...surely he took up our infirmities and carried our sorrows....he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities; the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and by his wounds we are healed...he was oppressed and afflicted yet he did not open his mouth; he was led like a lamb to the slaughter...Yet it was the Lord's will to crush him and cause him to suffer...the Lord makes his life a guilt offering...after the suffering of his soul he will see the light of life....'
>
> (Isaiah 53)[60]

[27] Why did Jesus have to tread the path that theologian Timothy Savage notes, is a ''strange' and 'alien' glory anticipated by ... Isaiah, a light revealed in the darkness of death, a splendour manifested in the most appalling object of antiquity - a cross'?[61]

Indeed, the blood-soaked cross paradoxically speaks of reconciliation, light and love, as personified in Jesus himself being described as the 'light of the world' in the prologue to John's gospel. The purpose of Jesus Christ's sacrifice, as described in Christian thought, was to reconcile his Father's creatures (humans) back into an intimate relationship with himself: at-one-ment. Theologians call this the 'atonement' and contend that all three dimensions of the trinity, the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, are involved in the process[62] and that it is the path to eternal life, deep joy and a 'peace ... which transcends all understanding' (Philippians 4: 7a; Isaiah. 26: 3) regardless of earth's circumstances. This is clearly described in an oft-cited bible verse …

> 'For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life' (John 3: 16)

[28] Commenting on the meaning of the atonement for individual identity, the priest-psychologist, Adrian Van Kaam[63] notes that 'an infinite love tenderly called me forth out of nowhere and nothingness; an unspeakable Love emptied itself to redeem the identity that I lost sight of in sinfulness; an enlightening Love keeps calling me back to what I am'. Herein lies the paradox of the Christian faith, articulated by C.S Lewis in that 'the more we let God take us over, the more truly ourselves we become - because he made … it is when I turn to Christ, when I give up myself to His personality, that I first begin to have a personality of my own',[64] in all domains of life, including sport.

[29] Following this central biblical theme of surrender to Christ - 'If anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation' (2 Corinthians 5: 17) - it is then the relationship in the heart of the Christian believer with a Father God, through the third person of the trinity, the Holy Spirit, that Christians believe 'guards' their 'hearts and minds in Christ Jesus' (Philippians 4: 7b). Coherent with the Christian anthropology laid out in my introduction the heart is then understood as the seat of all wrong or right feeling, thinking and behaving, and thus is the foundational source of human identity in all of life's activities, including sport. Considering that the Psalmist (51: 17) states that it is 'a broken and contrite heart ...' that allows for an intimate relationship with God, how does this fit with a modern understanding of Christianity in the west, and conceptions of identity in sport?

[30] The Reverend Mark Townsend's words in his recent thought-provoking book, The Gospel of Falling Down: The Beauty of Failure in an Age of Success,[65] conveys a realistic picture of the god-man who walked the earth two thousand years ago and the religion he expressed:

> 'Failure, rather than success, is at the heart of the life of Jesus and his message. He came to liberate us from the "gospel of success". It is not in "climbing the ladder of perfection" [i.e., maladaptive perfectionism] that we meet God, but in falling from it. And it is then that we discover the most beautiful spiritual gold ... The Gospel is not about success ... To make the Gospel into a means of being successful is to seriously miss the point. We live in a success-dominated world, and much of the (especially Western) Church has become a success-dominated religion. What is the central symbolic image for the Christian faith? It's a cross of wood, with a figure of a man nailed to it – a naked, bleeding man. A man so wounded, so humiliated, so crushed that one can barely imagine...'.

Therefore, as Clements and Savage have articulated, it is through a journey of weakness (not in character), brokenness, vulnerability and sacrificial love that Jesus went to the cross, and it is believed by Christians, resurrected by his Father - the event on which the Christian story stands or falls.[66] Interestingly then, consultant sport psychiatrist, Dr Daniel Begel, who has worked with amateur and professional American sports teams, elucidates how thoughts of 'weakness and vulnerability' in modern sport are often diametrically opposed to the identity of the modern athlete:[67]

> 'If there is any character trait that is anathema to an athlete it is that of weakness. Being unable to handle one's feelings, and confessing that inability to another human being in intimate conversation, is not usually concordant with an athlete's sense of mastery...the role of professional athlete may increase the risk of suffering a specific narcissistic vulnerability, and retirement from sports at any level carries with it an increased risk of clinical depression, especially if the retirement is forced by injury, or waning abilities ...'.

[31] Not to be misinterpreted at this juncture in my argument, achievement and excellence, strength of character and body and success in sport, is not at all antithetical to the Christian way of life. But it can be dangerous, because of the proud and self-reliant ethos of western culture that dominates big-business professional sport, which is often but certainly not always, characterized by individualism, vain-glory and ultimately pride of the heart.[68] Pride of the heart is what C.S. Lewis and professor of pastoral psychology, Donald Capps,[69] calls 'the great sin' and is the root of most other sins, which are arguably prevalent in modern sport, such as greed, vanity and self-glorification.

[32] Both Lewis and Capps are, however, balanced in their reflections on pride, emphasizing that there are positive and negative forms of pride. For example in sport, having a sense of one's own self-worth and dignity in performance as an athlete or coach, taking pleasure in being praised by parents, coaches, fans and team-mates and satisfaction in one's sporting achievements, are all examples of pride in a positive sense. This said, it has been argued, and I agree, that pride 'is now synonymous with virtue' in the institutions of sport, religion and the media.[70] According to Christian scripture, 'life projects' like sport, can then easily become idols that blind people to deeper spiritual truths about 'who they are' - their identity - and what is ultimately important in life.

[33] C.S Lewis unwittingly provided a sound theoretical basis for analyzing identity in sport from a Christian theological perspective.[71] If pride, as Lewis[72] suggests, 'is essentially competitive above all other vices' how does this specifically relate to understanding identity in sport? The findings of Stevenson's qualitative investigation of the culture of elite sport and the moral dilemmas this raises for Christian athletes,[73] sheds some light on this. One participant comments, 'It's weird. I just couldn't let go of not winning. If we lost, I just couldn't let it go for a week - it would, like, boil inside me'. Another participant states, 'I think there's times when … as an athlete, when we're excelling to become our best … [that] we lose sight of everything [else] around us'.

[34] Stevenson concludes that 'these athletes struggled with the overwhelming priority placed on winning in the contemporary sport culture' that 'led to a number of consequences with which they were uncomfortable'.[74] Clearly, organized child and youth sports are also a major vehicle for this cultural ethos and its subsequent problems. 'In childhood, the discovery of athletic talent may determine a person's role within the family and identity within society in significant, if not always salutary, ways', suggests sport psychiatrist, Begel.[75] It seems that the centrifugal forces that act upon and within the microcosm of sport are difficult to step outside of.

[35] Thomas á Kempis (1380-1471c.), in his well-known devotional work, The Imitation of Christ,[76] advises that 'no man can live in the public eye without risk to his soul'. Christian teaching suggests that the 'weapons' and source of 'power' with which humans (modern athletes) can combat their prideful human nature that will cause them to desire recognition, seek vain-praise and glory and act in a manner that will possibly lead to the alienation of others (opponents and family etc.), are love and humility from surrendering to God. As Capps has observed 'pride is also a form of isolation … and personal bondage … because it is a form of self-love in which we deny our need for community with others'.[77] Humility is the virtue directly opposite the sin of pride that leads to alienation and isolation, which Lewis[78] contends is the 'complete anti-god state of mind', and which had its genesis in the fall from grace of some of God's angelic realm and humanity. From this point in world history, in every dimension of life including sport, Andrew Murray[79] suggests that 'pride and humility are the two master powers - the two kingdoms at war' in our hearts, which will determine our feelings, thoughts and actions in the heat of sporting competition.

Concluding Reflections

[36] The aim of this paper was to provide a psychological and theological analysis of identity in sport while also acknowledging the importance of social, cultural and historical forces in identity formation. Following others, I have argued that as a 'moulder and reflection of 20th century attitudes towards human nature',[80] modern psychology (and sport psychology) that is largely characterized by individualism, humanism, positivism and a relativist epistemology, is diametrically opposed to Christian psychology (especially anthropology and ontology). As Oswald Chambers suggests, '… Christian psychology is not the study of human nature Christianised, but the endeavour to understand the wonder and the mystery of "Christ in you, the hope of glory"'.[81] Nonetheless, I also heartily support Dallas Willard,[82] who wisely notes that 'psychological and theological understanding of the spiritual life must go hand in hand. Neither of them is complete without the other'. Therefore, in any comprehensive study of identity in sport, both empirical and theoretical research in sport psychology, on areas such as 'athletic identity' (e.g., Athletic Identity Measurement Scale) motivational theory, human development models (e.g., Erikson), forms of psychological abnormality and mechanisms of the brain must be synthesized with sound theology and biblical anthropology.

[37] In particular, I would emphasize the accuracy of the anthropological starting point when studying identity in sport from a Christian perspective, in that 'the image of God in the New Testament reflects a theological and philosophical struggle with some of the most important questions of human existence. Who are we as humans, and to whom do we ultimately belong?'.[83] In trying to answer these questions in sport, scholars should carefully examine both Hebrew and Christian anthropology[84] when deciding how they should respond to the tenets of modern psychology, so that, as Johnson (1997) in pointing to the bible stresses, they are not taken '… captive through hollow and deceptive philosophy, which depends on human tradition and the basic principles of this world rather than Christ.'(Colossians 2: 8) - humanism, secularism, nihilism and selfishness. For those wishing to examine issues of identity in sport from a Christian standpoint there are a number of useful non-sport sources in the psycho-theological literature and writings on the 'Fatherhood of God',[85] which I have argued is central to understanding Christian identity in sport.

[38] Although previous writings specifically on athletic identity in the sports literature are sparse, the work of scholar Ashley Null, sport psychologist Mark Nesti and analyses of idolatry in sport, should all be of use in grasping the psychological and theological complexities of identity in the sports realm.[86] Following the mapping of the human genome at the turn of the 20th century and the valuable but primarily humanistic analyses of genetic enhancement in sport,[87] theological analyses are crucial in assessing the wider implications of being able to interfering with the make-up (anthropology) of human-beings.[88] Exploration of how states of heart, such as pride and humility, impact upon moral reasoning[89] and relationships in sport, is another important area to explore, for as C.S. Lewis has suggested, 'pride has been the chief cause of misery in every nation and every family since the world began … pride means enmity - it is enmity'.[90] A prideful heart that seeks personal glory, gain and self-worth primarily in sporting success, will often alienate and disregard others, leading to the damage and breakdown of relationships.

The role of shame and guilt in this process, which often leads to striving for personal glory and self-worth in sport and to the alienation of others, is a related area for further enquiry.[91]

[39] Research on how identity may impact upon sports leadership models from a Christian worldview is also needed. The concept of Servant Leadership described in Rieke, Hammermeister and Chase's empirical study of basketball coaches, a qualitative investigation by MacDonald and Kirk on Christian identity in health and physical education teachers and the legendary reflections of 'Coach Wooden', all provide a foundation for this.[92]

[40] To develop past thought-provoking work on identity in disability sport[93] from a Christian stance, researchers could build on the exploratory theological work of Watson, Watts and Parker and Watts,[94] by examining existential meaning and spirituality in athletes with physical and intellectual disabilities. What does physical movement through sporting activities mean, if anything, for those with profound intellectual disabilities? How does participation in sport impact on the identity of those with physical disabilities and how, if at all, could this have spiritual meaning? How do individuals in a society bound to a dominant worldview of competition, physical competence (e.g., able-bodied Olympics), rationality and intellectualism, respond to the broken minds of those with profound intellectual disabilities, that can't be fully 'understood', 'fixed' or 'cured'?

[41] Commenting on the theme of my last question, Graeme Watts[95] draws on the provocative suggestion of Wolf Wolfensberger[96] that people with an intellectual disability may have actually been chosen by God to be the prophets of our age - an age in which many seek to win-at-all-costs, to appear competent to 'have it all together'. Watts observes that Wolfensberger may be making this case with more than a touch of hyperbole but argues that in promoting values opposite to those so tightly held as 'normal', it is perhaps the obviously limited capacity of those with an intellectual disability which acts as a reminder that to be human also includes those who are dependent and fall short of generally held ideals. In this context I would also agree with Stanley Hauerwas'[97] assertion that those with profound disabilities often '… remind us of the limits of our power, and we do not like those who remind us', something that has perhaps significantly affected the Church's limited theological reflection on disability. Further study in this area may help 'self-reliant' westerners to consider life's purpose, which of course includes the meaning and purpose in sports and accurate conceptions of humility.

[42] Some sections of the Church have historically had a false view of humility, in which God-given gifts, talents and desires of the heart have been de-emphasized and shunned '...under the guise of devotion to Christ'.[98] Following Bill Johnson, I would argue this is not an accurate portrayal of Christian life, in which creativity, joy and excellence should, where possible, be sought in all domains of life, including sport. I also wholeheartedly support some of the conclusions of Smart,[99] in his comprehensive analysis of The Sport Star … Sporting Celebrity: 'the achievements of high profile professional sporting figures posses a quality that is increasingly rare in a world made cynical (corruption in sport) ... the excitement and emotion aroused by the uncertainty of sporting encounters ... the pleasure derived, and frequently collectively shared ... as a spectator or viewer'. In this vein, through analyzing Karl Barth's work on the famous composer, Wolfgang Amadaeus Mozart and his appreciation of Mozart's playful creativity and expression of his musical gift in the world, Metzger[100] reminds us that the Christian God delights in his creatures being ...

> '... creative within human culture ... to give glory to God by simply being ... by simply working or playing, one glorifies God ... God is glorified in the very imaginative and enterprising acts of human creation and recreation. Before God, there is room for free play'.

[43] Beginning with the seminal work of Dutch historian Johan Huizinga and followed by reflections from theologians and sport philosophers,[101] this playful, aesthetic and creative dimension of life that is often seen in sport, has been well-documented. It seems to most readily manifest itself in fun 'pick-up games' and when sport competition is played in the spirit of a 'mutual stringing together for excellence', the etymological root meaning of the term, competition.[102] In the modern era, the men's 2008 Wimbledon Tennis final (and the 2009 Australian Open final) between Roger Federer and Rafael Nadal was perhaps, an example of this. The TV commentator and ex-British number one tennis player, Andrew Castle, said of this exciting and passionate dual between two men at the height of excellence in the field, that it was not solely a demonstration of great tennis but an advert for the value and beauty of sport itself - it had a transcendent dimension (my paraphrase). There seemed to be a deep mutual respect between the Spaniard (Nadal) and the Swiss (Federer) and a form of humility that ironically is often only witnessed in those at the very peak of their field, in this case sport. Because, from a humanist's standpoint, they are secure (if with a degree of fragility, perhaps), in who they are and confident in their abilities, their selves.

[44] Sport itself could then be argued to possess a spiritual dimension, in that it seems to provide opportunity akin to what the sociologist of religion, Peter Berger,[103] called 'signals of transcendence … within the human condition'. Indeed, the great 19th century Russian novelist, Dostoyevsky,[104] was not ignorant to the fact that 'the universal and everlasting craving of humanity' is 'to find someone to worship' and in the sporting realm it is perhaps these 'moments of transcendence' and aesthetic beauty (amongst many other 'earthy' things), and the sporting demi-gods who provide them, that fit the bill. There is, however, a real danger in this quasi-transcendent understanding of life and sport, as poetically described by C.S. Lewis:

> 'The books or the music [and sporting moments] in which we thought the beauty was located will betray us if we trust to them; it was not in them, it only came through them, and what came through them was longing. These things - the beauty, the memory of our own past - are good images of what we really desire; but if they are mistaken for the thing itself they turn into dumb idols, breaking the hearts of their worshippers. For they are not the thing in itself; they are only the scent of a flower we have not found, the echo of a tune we have not heard, news from another country we have never visited … Our lifelong nostalgia, our longing to be reunited with something in the universe from which we now feel cut off … is no mere neurotic fancy, but the truest index of our real situation'.[105]

[45] Our 'real' situation? In his analysis of the idol-pride interface in the human heart, in both Augustine's autobiography, Confessions, and his most well-known theological work, The City of God, Reno concludes that '… we wrap our love of worldly things in this false tinsel of divinity and propose them to ourselves as idols worthy of worship. This strategy of self-deception allows us to pursue the finite goods of creaturely life as if they were images of the divine'.[106] Similarly, when describing human's often unconscious yearning for eternity, Van Kaam suggests, this leads to seeking '… something lasting amidst the transitoriness of countless self-expressions'.[107]

[46] It is argued that sport, could just be one such 'transitory self-expression' among many others, if it is an idolatrous quest and thus may lead to self-deception as to the deeper spiritual meaning of life. As C.S. Lewis contends above, if a human-being takes a 'life-project' like sport, which Christians believe is a gift from God, but mistake it '… for the thing itself they turn into dumb idols, breaking the hearts of their worshippers'. History shows that human-beings begin to consider and commit to religious faith for a whole range of reasons, nonetheless, it is quite often only when there is, as the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber called it, a 'shudder of identity',[108] when the pride and self-sufficiency of the human heart (not character) has been 'weakened', or what Wolfensburger[109] calls 'gentled', through an athlete's life - retirement, career-ending injury, or failure - that the deep religious-existential question might be asked: who am I without my abilities, my source of self-worth, my importance and status in the media, sporting sub-culture and world?

24

[47] This said, I do not want to propose a false dichotomy in this broken and messy world and I emphasize again, personal excellence, aesthetic beauty, creativity and human achievement should be sought in all walks of life, including sport. Nelson Mandela, in his inaugural presidential speech, conveys something of this …

> 'Our deepest fear is not that we are inadequate. Our deepest fear is that we are powerful beyond measure. It is our light, not our darkness, that most frightens us. We ask ourselves, who am I to be brilliant … talented …? Actually, who are you not to be? You are a child of God. Your playing small doesn't serve the world. There is nothing enlightening about shrinking so that other people won't feel insecure around you [false humility]. We were born to manifest the glory of God that is within us. It's not just in some of us; it's in everyone. And as we let our own light shine, we unconsciously give other people permission to do the same. As we are liberated from our own fear, our presence automatically liberates others'.[110]

[48] To be sure, such inspirational words resonate deep into all our hearts but I challenge the reader to consider where this inspiration and motivation comes from? The catholic priest-psychologist, Adrian Van Kaam, I would argue was writing prophetically in 1975, when he observed that 'we are on the rebirth of the awareness of human need for the transcendent …'.[111] The following two quotes I then believe can both be true, if we '… seek first his kingdom and his righteousness' (Matthew 6: 33). A recent newspaper advertisement for Gillette[112] that features three of the sporting world's demi-gods, Tiger Woods (until recently), Roger Federer and Thierry Henry, encourages the reader to:

'Show the world how phenomenal you can be'.

In the gospels, the founder and cornerstone of Christianity, Jesus of Nazareth, a humble carpenter and who Christians believe to be the son of God, encourages the reader to consider where this talent came from and what ultimately matters …

> 'If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me. For whoever loses his life for me will find it. What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?'
>
> Matthew 16: 24-26

Acknowledgements

Nick Watson, York St John University and the Centre for Sport, Spirituality and Religion, University of Gloucestershire, UK. To contact the author: n.watson@yorksj.ac.uk

Notes

[1] Smart, B., The Sport Star: Modern Sport and the Cultural Economy of Sporting Celebrity, (London: Sage Publications Ltd., 2005).

[2] Cited in the Foreword of Steenbergen, J., De Knop, P., and Elling, A.H.F. eds. Values and Norms on Sport: Critical Reflections on the Position and Meanings of Sport in Society (New York: Meyer and Meyer Sport, 2001), 11.

[3] Slot, O., "Fourth in the Olympics Hurt, but Retirement is Like a Death in the Family", The Times (Sport), 19th December, (2008), 98.

[4] Recent examples include: Watson, N.J., and A. Parker. (eds.), Sports and Christianity: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives (Foreword Michael Novak) (London: Routledge, 2012); Parry, J., Nesti, M., and N.J. Watson (eds.) Theology, Ethics and Transcendence in Sports (London, UK: Routledge, 2011); Hoffman, S., Good Game: Christianity and the Culture of Sports (Waco, Texas: Baylor University Press, 2010); Deardoff, D.II and White, J., (eds.) The Image of God in the Human Body: Essays on Christianity and Sports (Lampeter, Wales: The Edwin Mellen Press, 2008); Reid, H.L., The Philosophical Athlete, (Durham, North Carolina: Carolina Academic Press, 2002).

[5] Kretchmar, S. R., "Soft Metaphysics: A Precursor to Good Sports Ethics", Ethics and Sport, edited by Mcnamee, M. and Parry, J., (London: Routledge, 1998), pp. 19-34.

[6] See, Corlett, J., "Sophistry, Socrates, and Sport Psychology", The Sport Psychologist, 10 (1996): 84-94; Watson, N.J and Nesti, M., "The Role of Spirituality in Sport Psychology Consulting: An Analysis and Integrative Review of Literature", Journal of Applied Sport Psychology, 17 (2005): 228-239. Available Online: http://pdfserve.informaworld.com/657886_731218473_725758807.pdf (Accessed July 29, 2010); Nesti, M., Existential Psychology and Sport: Implications for Research and Practice, (London: Routledge, 2004).

[7] Ontology is a philosophical term that relates to questions of being and is '…specific to the problem of identity'. Zizioulas, J.D. 'On Being a person: Towards an Ontology of Personhood', in C. Schwobel, C. and C.E. Gunton, (Eds.), Persons, Divine and Human, (Edinburgh: T and T Clark, 1991), 133.

[8] Frankl, V.E., The Doctor and the Soul: From Psychotherapy to Logotherapy, (New York: Vintage Book, A Division of Random House, 1986), xii.

[9] All Biblical citations, unless otherwise stated, are from NIV (International Bible Society, 2002).

[10] Cited in, Warren, R, The Purpose Driven Life (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan), 80.

[11] See, Brewer, B.W., Van Raalte, J.L. and Petitpas, A.J., "Self-Identity Issues in Sport Career Transistions", Career Transitions in Sport: International Perspectives, edited by Lavallee, D. and Wylleman P. (Morgantown, WV, USA: Fitness Information Technology, Publisher, 2000), pp. 29-43; Begel, D. and Burton, R.W. (Eds.) Sport Psychiatry: Theory and Practice (New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 2000); Roderick, M., The Work of Professional Football: A Labour of Love? (London: Routledge, 2006); Macdonald, D. and Kirk, D., "Pedagogy, the Body and Christian Identity", Sport, Education and Society, 2, 4 (1999), 131-142; Hall, H.K., "Perfectionism: A Hallmark Quality of World Class Performers, or a Psychological Impediment to Athletic Development", Essential Processes for Attaining Peak Performance, edited by Hackfort, D. and Tenenbaum UK (Oxford: Meyer and Meyer Sport Ltd., Publisher, 2008), pp. 178-211.

[12] Stoll, S.K., and Beller, J.M., "Moral Reasoning in Athletic Populations: A 20 Year Review", Centre for Ethics, University of Idaho, (2008). Available Online: http://www.educ.uidaho.edu/center_for_ethics/research_fact_sheet.htm (accessed 11th November, 2008); Beller, J.M., Stoll, S.K., Burwell, B., and Cole, J., "The Relationship of Competition and a Christian Liberal Arts Education on Moral Reasoning of College Student Athletes", Research on Christian Higher Education, 3, (1996): 99-114.

[13] Jeeves, M.A., "Human Nature: Biblical and Psychological Portraits", Human Nature and the Millennium: Reflections on the Integration of Psychology and Christianity, Jeeves, M.A. (Grand Rapids, MI: Bake Books, 1997), pp. 98-126.

[14] Chambers, O., Biblical Psychology, (London: Oswald Chambers Publications Association and Marshall Morgan Scott, 1962/1936), 97-105.

[15] Vitz, P.C., Psychology as Religion: The Cult of Self-Worship, (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Williams Eerdmans Publishing, 1994).

[16] Higgs, R.J. and Braswell, M., An Unholy Alliance: The Sacred and Modern Sports, (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2004), 372.

[17] Kierkegaard, S., The Sickness Unto Death: A Christian Exposition of Edification and Awakening, translated by Alastair Hannay, (London: Penguin Books, 1989/1849).

[18] Lasch, C., The Culture of Narcissism: Life in an Age of Diminishing Expectations, (London: Abacus, 1980); Becker, E., The Denial of Death, (New York: The Free Press, A Division of Macmillan Publishing Co., Inc., 1973).

[19] Blankenhorn, D., Fatherless America: Confronting our Most Urgent Social Problem, (New York: Harper Perennial, A Division of Harper Collins Publishers, 1995); Nouwen, H.J.M., The Wounded Healer, (New York: Image Books, Doubleday, 1979); McClung, F., The Father Heart of God, England, Eastbourne: (Kingsway Publications, 2005); Kay, T., Fathering through Sport and Leisure (London: Routledge).

[20] Ibid, Smart, 1.

[21] Brewer, B.W., Van Raalte, J.L. and Linder, D.E., "Athletic identity: Hercules' muscles or Achilles Heel?" Academic Athletic Journal, 24 (1993), 237.

[22] Walker, S.H., Winning: The Psychology of Competition, (New York; W.W. Norton, 1980), 4.

[23] Newman, J., Competition in Religious Life, (Waterloo, Ontario, Canada: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1989).

[24] Simon, R.L., "The Ethics of Competition", Fair Play: Sports, Values and Society, edited by Simon, R.L., (Oxford: Westview Press, 1991), 33.

[25]Hyland, D.A., "Opponents, Contestants, and Competitors: The Dialectic of Sport", Philosophic Inquiry in Sport (second ed.) edited by Morgan, W.J. and Keier, K.V., (Champaign, IL: Human Kinetics, Publisher, 1988), 177.

[26]Kohn, A., No Contest: The Case Against Competition (revised ed.), (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1992), 106.

[27]Hamilton, M., An Augustinian Critique of our Relationship to Sport, in J, Parry., Nesti, M., and Watson, N.J. Theology, Ethics and Transcendence in Sports (London: Routledge), 25-34.

[28]Ibid, Reid, 106.

[29]Jackson, P., "My Rugby Obsession Has Left Me in Agony", Daily Mail, Tuesday 7th March, (2006), 80.

[30]Wilkinson, J., Tackling Life: Striving for Perfection, (UK: Headline, 2008).

[31]Ibid, Jackson, 80.

[32]Souster, M., "Wounded Hero Finally Set to Take His Leave in Pursuit of Fresh Challenge", The Times (Sport), Friday 13th March (2009), 84.

[33]Agassi, J.B. (Ed.), Martin Buber on Psychology and Psychotherapy: Essays, Letters, and Dialogue, (US: Syracuse University Press, 1999).

[34]Cited in, Kohn, A., No Contest: The Case Against Competition (Revised ed.) (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1992), 111.

[35]Sartre, J., Being and Nothingness (translated by Hazel E. Barnes), (New York: The Philosophical Library, Inc., 1956).

[36]Ibid, Becker, 3.

[37]Null, A., "'Finding the Right Place": Professional Sport as a Christian Vocation', The Image of God in the Human Body: Essays on Christianity and Sports, edited by Deardoff, D.II and White, J., (Lampeter, Wales: The Edwin Mellen Press, 2008), pp. 315-366.

[38] Ibid, Roderick.

[39]Ibid, Hall; Sager, S.S., Lavallee, D., and Spray, C.M., "Coping with the Effects of Fear of Failure: A Preliminary Investigation of Young Elite Athletes", Journal of Clinical Sports Psychology, 3 (2009): 73-98; Begel, D., "An Overview of Sport Psychiatry", American Journal of Psychiatry, 149, (1992): 606-614; Hamilton, M.J., "Shamelessness and its Effects on Contemporary Sport", paper presented at the 30th International Association of Philosophy of Sport Conference, Penn State University, PH, USA, 23 - 27th October, 2002; McNamee, M., Sports, Virtues and Vices: Morality Plays, (London: Routledge, 2008).

[40]Lavallee, D. and Wylleman, P. (Eds.) Career Transitions in Sport: International Perspectives, (Morgantown, WV, USA: Fitness Information Technology, 2000); Udry, E., Gould, D., Bridges, D., and Beck, L., "Down but Not Out: Athlete Responses to Season-Ending Ski Injuries", Journal of Sport and Exercise Psychology, 3 (1997), 229-248; Burton, R.W., "Mental Illness in Athletes", Sport Psychiatry: Theory and Practice, edited by Begel, D. and Burton, R.W. (New York: W.W. Norton and Company, Publisher, 2000), pp. 61-81.

[41]Ogilvie, B.C., "Counseling for Sports Career Termination", Sport Psychology: The Psychological Health of the Athlete, edited by May, J.R. and Asken, M.J., (New York: PMA, 1987), pp. 213-230; Ibid, Higgs and Braswell.

[42]Pannenberg, W., Anthropology in Theological Perspective, (Philadelphia, USA: Westminster Press, 1985); Ibid, Brewer, Van Raalte and Petitpas.

[43]Tillich, P., The Courage to Be, (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1952), 41.

[44] Ibid, Higgs and Braswell, 75.

[45]Nesti, M., "Suffering, Sacrifice, Sport Psychology and the Spirit", Sport and Spirituality: An Introduction, by Parry, J., Robinson, S., Watson. N.J. and Nesti, M.S., (London: Routledge, 2007), pp. 151-169.

[46]Hochstetler, D., Hopsicker, P., and Kretchmar, S. R. "The Ambiguity of Embodiment and Sport: Overcoming Theological Dichotomies", in Deardorff, D. and White, J., (eds.), A Christian Theology of Sport (Lametere, Wales: The Edwin Mellen Press, 2008), 61-77.

[47]Johnson, E.L., "Whatever happened to the Human Soul? A Brief Christian Genealogy of a Psychological Term", Journal of Psychology and Theology, 26, 1 (1998): 16-28.

[48]Watson, N.J. and White, J., "'Winning at all Costs' in Modern Sport: Reflections on Pride and Humility in the Writings of C.S. Lewis", Sport and Spirituality: An Introduction, by Parry, J., Robinson, S., Watson, N.J. and Nesti, M.S., (London: Routledge, 2007), 61-79.

[49] David, P., Human Rights in Youth Sport: A Critical Review of Children's Rights in Competitive Sport, (London: Routledge, 2005).

[50] Hyland, D., "Competition and Friendship", Journal of the Philosophy of Sport, 5 (1978): 27-37.

[51] Grimshaw, M., "I can't Believe my Eyes: The Religious Aesthetics of Sport as Postmodern Salvific Moments", Implicit Religion, 3, 2 (2000): 87-99.

[52] Prebish, C.S., "Religion and Sport: Convergence or Identity?", Religion and Sport: The Meeting of Sacred and Profane, edited by Prebish, C.S., (Westport Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1993), 45-76.

[53] Schmitt, R.L. and Leonard, W.M. II., "Immortalizing the Self through Sport", American Journal of Sociology, 91, 5 (1986): 1088-1111.

[54] Cashmore, E., "Chariots of Fire: Bigotry, Manhood and Moral Certitude in an Age of Individualism", Sport and Society, 11, 2/3 (2008), 162.

[55] Lewis, C.S., Mere Christianity, (New York: Harper Collins, 1997/1952), 100.

[56] Ibid, Pannenberg, 234.

[57] Maslow, A., Toward a Psychology of Being, (Princeton, N.J: Van Nostrand, 1962).

[58] Van Kaam, A.L., In Search of Spiritual Identity, (Denville, NJ: Dimension Books, 1975), 177, 195.

[59] Ibid, Vitz, 91.

[60] See Isaiah 9: 1-7; 52: 13-15; 53: 1-12.

[61] Savage, T.B., Power through Weakness: Paul's Understanding of the Christian Ministry in 2 Corinthians (Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 86), (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 188.

[62] McGrath, A., Christian Theology: An Introduction (third ed.), (Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, 2001). See chapter 10 and 13 of McGrath (2001). The doctrine of atonement explains how following the separation of God the Father (creator) from humans (creatures) at the fall of humanity (Genesis 3), in which humans in their pride, wilfully chose to disobey God's will for their lives, God the Father mercifully sent his Son, the second person of the trinity, the 'sacrificial lamb', to atone for the sins of humanity. This, it is argued in Christian thought, was so that God the Father could come back into a relationship with his creatures (humans)--at-one-ment—and offer eternal life, deep joy and a 'peace...which transcends all understanding' (Philippians 4: 7a).

[63] Ibid, Van Kaam, 143.

[64] Ibid, Warren, 80.

[65] Townsend, M., The Gospel of Falling Down: The Beauty of Failure in an Age of Success, (Winchester, UK: O books, 2007), 44-45.

[66] Clements, R., The Strength of Weakness: How God Uses our Flaws to Achieve His Goals, (Scotland: Christian Focus Publications, 1994); Ibid, Savage.

[67] Begel, D., "Introduction: The Origins and Aims of Sport Psychiatry", Sport Psychiatry: Theory and Practice, edited by Begel, D. and Burton, R.W. (New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 2000, Publisher), xiii-xx.

[68] Watson, N.J. Identity in Sport: A Psychological and Theological Analysis, in J. Parry., M.N. Nesti, M., and N.J. Watson (eds.) Theology, Ethics and Transcendence in Sports (London, UK: Routledge, 2011, 107-148. Ibid, Watson and White.

[69] Capps, D., Deadly Sins and Saving Virtues, (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987), 46-52; Ibid, Lewis.

[70] Ibid, Higgs and Braswell, 372.

[71] Ibid, Watson and White.

[72] Ibid, Lewis, 101.

[73] Stevenson, C.L., "Christian Athletes and the Culture of Elite Sport: Dilemmas and Solutions," Sociology of Sport Journal, 14 (1997): 241-262.

[74] Ibid, Stevenson, 244-245.

[75] Ibid, Begel.

[76] Á Kempis, T., The Imitation of Christ (translated by Leo Sherley-Price), (London: Penguin Books, 1952).

[77] Ibid, Capps, 50.

[78] Ibid, Lewis, 100.

[79] Murray, A., Humility, (New Kensington, PA, USA: Whitaker House, 1982).

[80]Johnson, E.L., "Christ, The Lord of Psychology", Journal of Psychology and Theology, 25, 1 (1997): 11-27.

[81]Chambers, O., "The Psychology of Redemption", The Complete Works of Oswald Chambers, edited by McCasland, D. (Grand Rapids, MI: Discovery House Publishers, 1922), pp. 1059-1104.

[82]Willard, D., "Spiritual Formation in Christ: A Perspective on What is and How it Might be Done", Journal of Psychology and Theology, 28, 4 (2000): 254-258.

[83]Krause, D., "Keeping it Real: The Image of God in the New Testament", Interpretation: A Journal of Bible and Theology, 59, 4 (2005): 358-368.

[84]McFadyen, A., The Call to Personhood: A Christian Theory of the Individual in Social Relationships, (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1990); Chambers, O., "Our Portrait in Genesis", The Complete Works of Oswald Chambers, edited by McCasland, D. (Grand Rapids, MI: Discovery House Publishers, 1957), pp. 957-981; John Paul II, The Theology of the Body: Human Love in the Divine Plan (Foreword by John S. Grabowski), (Boston: Pauline Books and Media, 1997); Robinson, J.A.T., The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology (Colorado Springs, CO, USA: Bimellenial Press, 2002).

[85]See Journal of Psychology and Theology, the Journal of Psychology and Christianity, the Journal of Psychology and Judaism and the recent text: Miller, W.R. and Delaney, H.D. (eds.) Judeo-Christian Perspectives on Psychology: Human Nature, Motivation, and Change (Washington, DC: American Psychological Association, 2005). The work of psychologists, such as: Vitz, P.C. Faith of the Fatherless: The Psychology of Atheism, (Dallas, USA: Spence Publishing Company, 199); Morea, P., In Search of Personality: Christianity and Modern Psychology (London: SCM Press, 1997); and the writings of Swiss psychiatrist Paul Tournier, see, Collins, C.R., The Christian Psychology of Paul Tournier (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1973). As I have argued, the doctrine of the 'Fatherhood of God' is also central to understanding Christian identity in sport, see: Stibbe, M., From Orphans to Heirs: Celebrating our Spiritual Adoption (Oxford, UK: The Bible Reading Fellowship, 1999) and Wright, C.J.H. Knowing God the Father through the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL, USA: IVP Academic, An Imprint of InterVarsity Press, 2007).

[86]Ibid, Null and Watson and White; Nesti, M., "The Spirit of Sport: An Existential Psychology Perspective", Sport and Spirituality: An Introduction, by Parry, J., Robinson, S., Watson, N. J. and Nesti, M. S., (London: Routledge, 2007a), 119-134; Nesti, M., "Persons and Players: a Psychological Perspective", Sport and Spirituality: An Introduction, by Parry, J., Robinson, S., Watson, N.J. and Nesti, M.S., (London: Routledge, 2007c), 135-150; White, J., "Idols in the Stadium: Sport as an 'Idol Factory'", The Image of God in the Human Body: Essays on Christianity and Sports, edited by Deardorff, D.II and White J., (Lampeter, Wales: The Edwin Mellen Press,2008), 127-172; Moltmann, J., "Olympia between Politics and Religion", Sport, Gregory and John Coleman Baum, (Edinburgh, UK: T and T Clark, 1989), 101-109.

[87]For example, Miah, A., Genetically Modified Athletes: Biomedical Ethics, Gene Doping and Sport, (London: Routledge, (2004).

[88]Trothen, T.J. "Better than Normal? Constructing Modified Athletes and a Relational Theological Ethic", in J. Parry., M.S. Nesti, and N.J. Watson (2011) Theology, Ethics and Transcendence in Sports (London, UK: Routledge, 2011), 64-81; Trothen, T.J., "Redefining Human, Redefining Sport: The Imago Dei and Genetic Modification Technologies", The Image of God in the Human Body: Essays on Christianity and Sports, edited by Deardorff, D.II and White, J., (Lampeter, Wales: The Edwin Mellen Press, 2008), 217-234.

[89]Worthington Jr, E.L., and Berry, J.W., "Virtues, Vices, and Character Development", Judeo-Christian Perspectives on Psychology: Human Nature, Motivation, and Change, edited by Miller, W.R. and Delaney, H.D., 2005, (Washington, DC: American Psychological Association, 2005), 145-164.

[90]Ibid, Lewis, 102.

[91]Ibid, Hamilton.

[92]Rieke, M., Hammermeister, J., and Chase, M., "Servant Leadership in Sport: A New Paradigm for Effective Coaching Behaviour", International Journal of Sports Science and Coaching, 3, 2 (2008): 227-239; Ibid, MacDonald and Kirk; Schroeder, P.J and Scribner, J.P., "To Honor and Glorify God: The Role of Religion in One Intercollegiate Athletics Culture", Sport, Education and Society, 11, 1 (2006): 39-54; Wooden, J., Wooden on Leadership (with Steve Jamison), (UK:

McGraw-Hill, 2005).

[93]For example: Smith, B and Sparkes, A.C., "Changing Bodies, Changing Narratives and the Consequences of Tellability: A Case Study of Becoming Disabled through Sport", Sociology of Health and Illness, 30, 2 (2008): 217-236; Sparkes, A.C. and Smith, B., "Sport, Spinal Cord Injury, Embodies Masculinities, and the Dilemmas of Narrative Identity", Men and Masculinities, 4, 3 (2002): 258-285.

[94]Watson, N.J., "Special Olympians as a 'Prophetic Sign' to the Modern Sporting Babel", in N.J. Watson and A. Parker. (eds.), Sports and Christianity: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives (Foreword Michael Novak) (London: Routledge, 2012); Watson, N.J. and Parker, A. (manuscript in preparation) 'Step Aside were Coming Through': A Case Study of the Role of Sport in the Life of a Father and his Son who has Profound Disabilities, Practical Theology (manuscript to be submitted for consideration); Parker, A., and Watson, N.J., From Rural Kenya to London 2012: a Case Study of Anne Wafula Strike, a Christian Female Paralympian, Journal of Religion, Disability and Health (manuscript to be submitted for consideration); Watts, G. (2007) Athletes with a Disability – Mixed Messages from the Bible, Paper Presented at the Inaugural International Conference on Sport and Spirituality, Centre for the Study of Sport and Spirituality (2003-2009), York St John University, York, England, UK, 28 – 31 August.

[95]Watts, G., "Spirituality in the Context of Profound Intellectual Disability". Paper Read at a Conference on Spirituality, Human Development & Well-being, University of Western Sydney, July 24-25 (2008), 8-9.

[96]Wolfensberger, W., "The Prophetic Voice and the Presence of Mentally Retarded People in the World Today", The Theological Voice of Wolf Wolfensberger, edited by Gaventa, W. and Coulter, C., 2001, (Binghamton, New York: The Haworth Pastoral Press, 2001), 11-48.

[97]Hauerwas, S., Suffering Presence, (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame., 1986), 176.

[98]Johnson, B., Dreaming with God: Secrets of Redesigning your World through God's Creative Flow (Foreword by James W. Goll), (Shippensburg, PA: Destiny Image Publishers Inc., 2006), 38.

[99]Ibid, Smart, 198-199.

[100]Metzger, P.L., The Word of Christ and the World of Culture: Sacred and Secular through the Theology of Karl Barth, (Cambridge, UK: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2003), 197.

[101]Huizinga, J., Homo Ludens: A Study of the Play Element in Culture, (Boston, MA: Beacon, 1950); Moltmann, J., Theology of Play, (New York: Harper, 1972); Johnston, R.K., The Christian at Play, (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1983); Kretchmar, S., "Why Dichotomies make it Difficult to see games as Gifts from God", in Parry, J., Nesti,, M. and Watson N. J. (eds.), Theology, Ethics and Transcendence in Sports (London, UK: Routledge. 2011), 185-200.

[102]Ibid, Hyland 1978, 1988.

[103]Berger, P., A Rumour of Angels, (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1970), 52.

[104]Dostoyevsky, F. (1967 / 1927) The Brothers Karamazov (Volume 1, trans. Constance Garnett with an Introduction by Edward Garnett), London: J.M. Dent and Sons (cited in Metzger, 2003: 188).

[105]This quote from Lewis's book, Transposition and Other Addresses (Ch. 2), was cited in Kilby, C.S. (ed.) A Mind Awake: An Anthology of C.S. Lewis, New York: Harvest Book, Harcourt Brace and Company, 1968), 22-23.

[106]Reno, R.R., "Pride and Idolatry", Interpretation: A Journal of Bible and Theology, 60, 2 (2006), 176.

[107]Ibid, Van Kaam, 138.

[108] Ibid, Agassi.

[109]Wolfensberger, W., "The Most Urgent Issues Facing Us as Christians Concerned with Handicapped Persons Today", The Theological Voice of Wolf Wolfensberger, edited by Gaventa, W. and Coulter, C., 2001, (Binghamton, New York: The Haworth Pastoral Press, 1983), 98.

[110]Cite in Mason, M., Practicing the Presence of People: How We Learn to Love (USA: WaterBrook, 1999).

[111]Ibid, Van Kaam, 181.

[112]See Gillette Mens Razors & Blades Range - Gillette Fusion Roger, Thierry And Tiger, Available: http://www.visit4info.com/advert/Gillette-Fusion-Roger-Thierry-And-Tiger-Gillette-Mens-Razors-Blades-Range/55260 (accessed 2010)